When Superintendent Tom Maslij returns to CID and takes charge of his first murder investigation for several years, he hopes this will be an opportunity to prove to himself, as well as some of his more cynical colleagues, that he is a real detective and not just a pen-pushing backroom boy who should have been left in the dreaming spires of police HQ until he qualified for his pension.

Unfortunately the enquiry drags Maslij back to the station where he started his career and throws him into the midst of former associates on both sides of the law, many of whom haven't fared as well in their working or personal lives as he appears to have done. Frustration builds when it initially seems impossible to identify the victim, whose respectable appearance doesn't sit comfortably with the situation in which her body is found or the past life that a post-mortem suggests she has led. Maslij questions whether some of his officers, as well as supposed partners in other agencies, are with him or against him. Nevertheless, suspects are thrown up, arrests are made and it looks as though the right person has been charged.

As past mistakes, the cutting of corners and indiscretions come to light, Maslij learns the hard way that advice he received years earlier was spot on - a police officer who is careless about the 3 Ps (paperwork, property and prostitutes) will suffer the consequences in the long run. What his mentors hadn't told him was that his life and the safety of his family would be under threat and that he would need to work quickly to distinguish between his friends and his enemies, before other people paid the price.
